It is considered a great bargain at this price inasmuch as it cost originally over $75,000, and still relains the greater part of its extensive and its session to-night at Melodeon Hall, costly equipment. In its day it turned out a variety of important and heavy work for the mills and shops of this city, and was considered a concern of great value. By reason of the pecuniary embarrassments of Mr. Hamilton, and his subsequent death, the foundry finally passed into the hands of its principal creditor, the Merchants National Bank, and has been held ever since as one of the assets of that institution. The depression following the panic, and the doubt and uncertainty that were thereby thrown over all kinds of iron works. rendered this establishment a dead asset on the hands of the bank, although several years ago, and shortly after its stoppage, negotiations were entered into but not consumated, that promised to realize a much larger sum than was obtained yesterday. from Mctudley's spelling-book. A ruling of the pronouncer nearly ended the affair at the start. Pare was given out and spelled par and pair before it was spelled the way it happened to be in the book, and he refused to define it. Many of the spellers were put down on words that are spelled more than one way, but only one in that book. At last keekson and kraal put down several on each side. If another spelling match be arranged, and there are many, if they could be got together, who would like to take part in one, some stated authority should be the final resort.
